Drug design and therapeutics against tuberculosis. Extensive research into the pathogenesis of mycobacterium tuberculosis has revealed many essential cellular mechanisms required for growth and persistence of the bacterium within human macrophages. It is estimated that approximately 200 essential genes of M. tuberculosis have been identified, while more than 700 genes appear to be dispensable for growth in vitro, and often not essential for disease in vivo. Most of the genes appear to have diverse functions in metabolic pathways, transcription and translation, cell wall biosynthesis and virulence. Comparative analysis of the protein sequence data from M. tuberculosis and Mycobacterium bovis BCG has indicated that a number of currently used drugs against tuberculosis target various aspects of the bacterial cell wall, ATP synthase, RNA polymerase, permease and hemolysin. No one single protein or pathway has been identified as a suitable target for the development of novel drugs.
