How the Church Lost the Lowest Income Group of Families In a recent blog post, David Pollard, Honorary Senior Research Fellow in the Department of Social Policy and Social Work at the London School of Economics, described the differences between the Church of England and Church of Scotland and the way they have reached out to struggling families. He noted that in the years before the creation of the social work profession, the two churches dealt with poverty through charity. In his own words: In practice, the poor were cared for largely through Christian-related charities. The Evangelical population had a form of Christian Social Unionism as advocated by Charles Kingsley and others. They were focused, not on national health care and the welfare state, but on a mission that included a contribution to Christian, moral, social and economic initiatives outside the narrow English context. They saw themselves as acting as the stewards of God's resources on Earth in opposition to a system seen to neglect the poor and to espouse policies that prioritized individual self-interest rather than social responsibility. Unfortunately, religious charities were stretched to the limit, so one of the churches reformulated its position. In our present era it seems the Church of Scotland has gone for the latter, making 595f342e71
