1. Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to the field of blood pumps, and more particularly to the field of air-driven blood pumps which extract blood from the patient, and then return it through a circulatory system that provides blood flow from an artery to a vein of the patient, with the patient being the extracting and returning circulatory system.

2. Description of the Related Art The process of extracting blood from the patient, and returning the blood back to the patient, can cause problems. For example, one common problem can occur if the extracting and returning blood flow draws blood from the jugular vein of the patient instead of the subclavian vein of the patient. In this case the extracted blood enters the jugular veins and backs up, since the vein from the jugular vein to the jugular bulb is much longer than the subclavian vein to the subclavian vein, which is connected to the pulmonary artery. This can cause a host of problems. For example, a condition known as “jugular vein distention,” can occur. This condition results in swelling of the jugular vein and (typically) can cause pain and discomfort to the patient. The condition is also a blood dyscrasia and is one of the more common causes of congestive heart failure, which in itself is also a very common cause of patient hospitalization. Another problem that can occur is “peripheral vasoconstriction.” If the patient's blood pressure is held too high, the veins will constrict, including the subclav 6d1f23a050
